

NEUROFEEDBACK THERAPY

Madeline was put into foster care when she was less than a year old.

The trauma of being removed from her home caused her to never develop healthy attachment bonds with either her biological or foster parents. When Madeline was four, she was adopted by her foster parents. Despite their efforts to provide a stable, loving home, she was impacted by the attachment trauma she had endured and was diagnosed with Oppositional Defiant Disorder. Her parents did not want to medicate their daughter at such a young age and searched for other options. They modified her diet, took parenting classes, and put her into mental health therapy. Madeline's parents also discovered neurofeedback as a non-invasive treatment program. Since Madeline has been getting weekly neurofeedback, she is doing well in school, has made friends, and developed empathy for others.

NEUROFEEDBACK is a non-invasive procedure which can reduce the effects of many emotional and physical conditions without medication. Neurofeedback can TRAIN THE BRAIN to better self-regulate and take care of itself.

Neurofeedback therapy is used:

- Across the life span, but mostly for children and adolescents.
- With people who may have ADHD or Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD), developmental trauma, or symptoms of anxiety and depression.
- In conjunction with psychotherapy.

Neurofeedback therapy is recognized as one of the best practices for ADHD by the American Academy of Pediatrics.
